From the President:

Spring is coming like a freight train. We have survived the hundred days of January, the sixty days of February and the foolishness of another time change. I am elbow deep in the craziness that is seed sowing and plant starting. I'm losing square footage of living room to tables of seedling trays by the day. I was looking through some old garden notes the other day and found some climate records that show I usually lose my snow cover from late February to mid-March. Not this year. There are parts of my garden that still have three to four feet of snow. The warmest areas are starting to be exposed, causing spikes in my spring fever. I trust you are as eager as I am. Before we know it, it will be time to harden off this year's starts and then "blink" the May plant sales will be upon us.

Happy Gardening.
Jaime Rodriguez

The Discussion Continues About Material Options for Trough Construction

Guest speaker, Rob Staniland will discuss alternative materials for trough construction.

Do you recognize this plant?

This photo was taken at the Alaska Botanical Garden where this plant was thriving in a large shady area. Please see page 5 for a plant profile written by Florene Carney.

Plant Profile

By Florene Carney

Cypripedium guttatum, the spotted lady's slipper<sup>[2]</sup> or Alaskan lady's slipper,<sup>[3]</sup> is a species of orchid found on three continents. It is native to Belarus, Russia(European Russia, Siberia and Russian Far East) as well as China (Hebei, Heilongjiang, Jilin, Liaoning, Nei Mongol, Ningxia, Shaanxi, Shandong, Shanxi, Sichuan, Tibet, and Yunnan), Korea, Mongolia, Bhutan, Alaska (including the Aleutians) and northern Canada (Yukon and Northwest Territories).<sup>[1]</sup>

This Lady Slipper grows well when you can duplicate its needs. I grow it on the East side of our house in partial shade. The soil is loamy, loose, and rich. They grow shallow, so roots are just under the topdressing of finely chopped birch and aspen leaves (about two inches) I have them planted with the giant Hosta, Sum and Substance. The cypropediums tend to die back after blooming and the hosta grows out at just the right time to cover the yellowing leaves. In the fall I cover the entire bed with a fresh layer of leaf mulch to take it through the winter.

Look for them on the Sale Table at ARGS Plant Sale, May 25, 2024 at Snowfire Gardens.

There will also be small bags of leaf mulch available for sale along with the plants.
